Product Description

Among the Panzer IV tanks that were used during the Second World War and continued to support the advance of the German army, the G-type was the first to be equipped with a 7.5 cm gun with a long barrel. The early production models were manufactured from March 1942 to June 1943 and were characterised by the use of rounded jet brakes. At that time, the German armoured troops on the Russian front were fighting with the short-barreled Panzer IV tanks against the formidable enemy T34 medium tanks, and the Panzer IV G-type became a valuable force that could compete with the T34 for the first time. In addition, medium military motorbikes, equipped with a 2-stroke 350 cc single-cylinder engine, are light and easy to handle, extremely reliable and can withstand the harsh Russian climate conditions, making them useful for communication such as messenger and reconnaissance purposes. They were not only used on the Russian front, but also on various fronts in Europe and North Africa until the end of the war.
